The significance of having both Ian and Tony Boeckh from the Graham Boeckh Foundation join us in Chatham for the ACCESS Open Minds CK launch and a special Rotary dinner last night was something that cannot be overlooked. These two men have dedicated their lives and their resources to helping young people and their families better access what continues to be a confusing myriad of mental health services. He is a kind, soft -spoken articulate man, who can speak from direct tragic experience. He is a voice we all need to hear.

As an aside – the $25Million TRAM project headed up by Dr. Ashok Malla mentioned in the article featured in the announcements is one that launched our very own ACCESS Open Minds Chatham-Kent and Dr, Malla was in attendance.

Tony Boeckh struggled with the mental-health care system for years while trying to get his son Graham diagnosed and treated for schizophrenia.

The wrong diagnoses, wrong medications — the struggle was ongoing and unrelenting as he tried to help his son.

And then Graham turned 18, and no longer fit the age range for the mental-health care program he was part of at Queen's University in Kingston, Ont.

He died four years later, in 1986, from what Boeckh described as complications related to the medication he was taking.

Many families can relate to what Boeckh and his family went through: Only a small percentage of people — particularly youth — get the right mental-health care, by the right people, at the right time.

"They say that the best way to get treatment for a serious mental illness is either to go the emergency ward or go to prison. It's absolutely shocking," he said.

Turn 18, find a new doctor

Boeckh said the mental-health care system hasn't changed much in the 30 years he has been dealing with it. The problem is not merely Quebec-based, but a national problem affecting many young Canadians, he said.

"I think things are better, but anybody you talk to that's in the field will admit that the system is totally dysfunctional in dealing with most young people who have mental-health problems," Boeckh said.

His family's struggle with the health-care system started all over again when his son turned 18, at which point he was ejected from the children's treatment centre and left to his own devices to find new care.

Fortunately, Boeckh said, he knew doctors and was able to find his son care.

"[But for] people who don't have contacts, it's a catastrophe. They just don't know where to go," he said.

ACCESS meant to transform mental-health care

Last summer, Boeckh did something about it. His foundation and the Canadian Institute for Health Research partnered to give a prize worth $25 million to the winner of a contest meant to improve the system surrounding care for mental illness.

Dr. Ashok Malla of Montreal's Douglas Hospital was the winner, and named his new Canada-wide project ACCESS.

ACCESS consists of a national network within a larger research project called TRAM (Transformational Research in Adolescent Mental Health). Its purpose is to change the way the mental-health care system handles young people to the age of 25.

Boeckh said part of the task ACCESS faces is to create a program so comprehensive that it would sway other provinces to jump on board.

He said one of the major pillars of the program is to better integrate services and treatments. For example, a patient who has both an addiction and an eating disorder may be treated by two different people.

"Treat them all in the same place, and if they can't, then at least have a youth-friendly place," Boeckh said.

Better integration would mean helping people more directly and quickly, said Malla, of the Douglas Hospital.

"The longer delays are clearly associated with worse outcomes. You have to intervene with the right treatment and keep engaged with the right treatment," Malla said.

We have had many requests and questions from Rotarians about how to help our fellow citizens (and Rotarians) in the Fort McMurray area.

Our President Fannie has reached out to President Matt Pate of the Rotary Club of Fort McMurray - Oilsands and he has advised that at this time, the best thing we can do is donate to the Red Cross, as the Canadian government has generously offered to match all donations. We will keep you posted, and our thoughts are with everyone affected by this terrible disaster.
