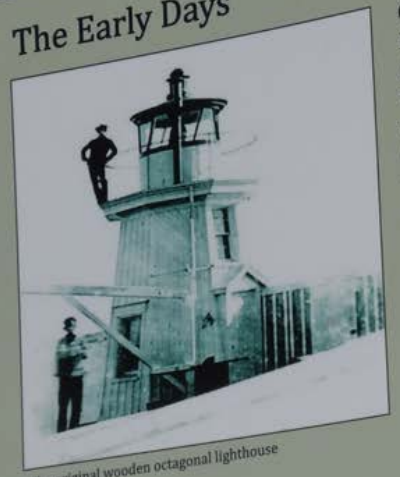
PORTLAND BREAKWATER LIGHT

The Early Days



The original wooden octagonal lighthouse

Construction of the Portland Breakwater was begun in July 1836 to protect the inner harbor from destructive ocean storms. The first lighthouse on the Breakwater, built in 1855, was a small wooden octagonal tower that stood about 200 feet away from the existing lighthouse.

The Breakwater was extended to its current length of 1,990 feet in 1872-73 and the old wooden tower was removed and replaced with the current lighthouse in 1875. Its design was modeled after the Choragic Monument of Lysicrates in Athens, Greece, and is unique among light-houses around the world.

Bill Kourakos dips his brush carefully as he and other members of the South Portland-Cape Elizabeth Rotary Club put a final coat of paint on the keeper's quarters at Portland Head Light in Cape Elizabeth. The Rotarians worked through the weekend, helping to turn the 100-year-old house into a museum.

Not Interested In Celtics' Job

Big Bob Branum, center, told members of the South Portland-Cape Elizabeth Rotary Club hcnoring the Cape's Western Maine Class L basketball champions Wednesday night he isn't in the running to succeed Red Auerbach as Boston Celtics coach — despite five months of such rumors. Former Celtic Branum said he already has signed his contract to return to Norwich University as head hoop mentor. Here he chats with Cape Elizabeth's Terry Gorman, who was chosen the outstanding player of the Western Maine tourney, and Rotary Club president Allen B. Rowe Jr. (By Staff Photographer Merrill)
