PROGRAM

Dr. Bridget Baxter, the lab manager for the Northern Colorado Coronavirus Biobank, at Colorado State University, gave attendees a close look at the highly important research she and her colleagues are doing, in an effort to answer questions about the nature of what is commonly called “Long COVID.” Highlights included these:
- The on-campus laboratory, operated by students and staff, is collecting samples of blood, saliva, stools and nasal swabs to catalog how different people have responded to COVID-19 over time.
- One area of their research investigates experiences of “long haulers” - people who contract COVID-19 and suffer with symptoms for months, perhaps years, after first testing positive.
- They are seeking to measure not only the medical ramifications but also the more insidious “quality of life” impacts of extended COVID infection.
- Many patients studied had never previously divulged to anyone else the deleterious physical, mental, or emotional effects they have experienced.
