PROGRAM

Robert Diffendal, Jr., UNL Professor Emeritus, Conservation & Survey Division presented a Non-Specialist's View of Native American Mound Builders Structures in the American Mid-Continent.

There is considerable difference of opinion regarding connections between the ancient people of Mexico and the southeast and southwestern US. One theory consists of 3 rules: 1. Everyone knew everything, 2. There are no coincidences and 3. Distances can be dealt with. The fact that many ancient peoples from distant parts of the continent used the same symbols would tend to prove this theory.

The general consensus has always been that humans first came to the Americas about 12,000 years ago. Evidence has recently been discovered in Pennsylvania which has been carbon dated 16,000 years ago.

In the Ohio/Wisconsin area images have been found which are very similar to images created by Mayans in Mexico. There is also evidence that the people were obtaining silver from Canada and Conch shells from Florida which shows that there was considerable trading going on over very long distances.

Mr. Diffendal and his wife have been spending the last number of years visiting mound structures built by ancient Native Americans. He showed the group pictures of a number of locations such as Fort Ancient, OH, Poverty Point, LA, Cahokia, IL and Folsom NM and described the unique features of each site. The timeline of the sites runs from 12,000 BC up to 1750 AD.
