1967 - "Let's Go Fishing" with Hayward Rotary Club

After the Lake Chabot reservoir was opened to the public for recreational use in the 1960s, Hayward Rotary Club started the "Let's Go Fishing" project. The annual event provided special needs children the experience of going out for a day of fishing and recreation at the lake. Activities included fishing, horseback riding, picnicking, and outdoor games. Shown in this 1967 photo are Hayward Rotary Club members Dr. William Shriner and Bud Jordan, rancher. The project continued for fifty years, and reached many thousands of local children who were introduced to the enjoyment and rewards of outdoor sport fishing. #payitforward

A History of Hayward Rotary Club Part III: The War Years 1940's

The 1940's were defined by World War II: its horrors, triumphs, and aftermath. After the devastating surprise attack on Pearl Harbor, there was great concern about a another Japanese attack on the US mainland. Fear, racism and prejudice, already pervasive throughout American society at the time, reached a new fever pitch, and after Pearl Harbor, resulted in President Franklin Roosevelt ordering all people of Japanese descent to relocation camps for the duration of the war.

1942 - Internment of Japanese Americans

Following the bombing of Pearl Harbor, President Franklin Roosevelt on January 14, 1942 issued Proclamation 2537, laying the groundwork for the internment of Japanese-American citizens during World War II. Nearly 120,000 Japanese Americans were removed from their homes and placed in camps - the largest forced relocation in U.S. history. The military suspected that Japanese Americans might be loyal to Japan, and could spy on or sabotage U.S. military efforts. Social justice groups protested the internment as a violation of Japanese Americans' civil rights. In 1944, the Supreme Court ruled that the detainment of loyal American citizens was unconstitutional. In 1945, the detainees were set free.

Many Japanese Americans lived in Hayward at the time. They were forced to leave their lives behind and board buses for the camps. The buses picked them up at Heritage Plaza, then known as City Hall Plaza, on C and Watkins Streets. Famed photographer Dorothea Lange documented the boarding in a stark and stunning series of photographs.

Not all Americans agreed with the President's decision, and history rightly looks back on it harshly. But at the time, most Americans felt dutybound to follow through with it. Some did so while helping displaced families as much as they could. In Hayward, Judge Jake Harder went to great efforts to assure that all of the proper legal documents were filed on behalf of interned citizens, and did what he could to protect their interests while they were away, for example by maintaining farmlands

This photo by Dorothea Lange shows the baggage of Japanese American evacuees lined up along Watkins Street in Hayward, California in 1942. Buses lined the street to pick up the evacuees and their belongings for the long trip to the relocation camps deep in the remote deserts of the Southwest. Japanese Americans were held in the camps for three years.

and buildings so that they would not deteriorate. Unfortunately, despite these well-intentioned efforts, many Japanese American families lost everything.

Meanwhile, World War II raged on, bringing with it a constant visceral threat of another attack on US soil, especially the West Coast. "Listening Posts" were set up all along the coastline. The Hayward Rotary Club financed and staffed a post in the Hayward hills to monitor aircraft traffic and report on it. John Sandoval, a Rotarian and a local historian during that era gives this account of working at the Listening Post:

"We watch from Rotary's observation post on Sunday nights from seven to eleven. There are three of us on and we alternate to conserve on rubber by taking our cars successively. In the early part of the shift the sun is in our eyes, and all three stay outside and watch dusk descend upon the village below us and the majestic sweep of the Bay. One by one the lights twinkle on like a scale map with flashing miniature bulbs like those we saw on Treasure Island. The sheriff patrol car slithers by and we call out our weekly greeting and enter the call in our log book. Tonight we have a search-light test and we're pretty busy logging the planes that come over - they try to sneak up on the searchlight crews at the army posts below us."

Hayward Rotary projects immediately following the war included sending bundles of clothing and food to the war-torn European countries, including Greece, Norway, Denmark, and England.
