TODAY’S PROGRAM

Graham Beal - “Navigating Change at The Detroit Institute of Art” (DIA)

Graham was educated at the University of Manchester and the University of London.

He has held leadership positions at several art museums throughout the country, holding over 40 exhibitions. Today he told us about the challenges of navigating the politics of keeping the DIA up and running. He became the director there in 1999 while it was under renovation. It was up to him to reinstall 6,000 objects in 150,000 square feet of gallery. It reopened in 2000 and receives about 600,000 visitors each year. There are also reproductions of works throughout the city of Detroit for public viewing.

We learned that in the last century it was wealthy individuals who bought art in Europe to bring to the US and donate to the DIA. In 2012 the city of Detroit went into bankruptcy because of mismanagement of the pension fund. They wanted to sell off works of art from the DIA to make up for the shortfall. Eventually twelve private foundations came up with $350 million which was matched by private donations. This saved the DIA. The museum is one of the wealthiest in America which enables it to acquire expensive works of art.

Graham’s presentation was educational and entertaining. He used many slides of works of art and explained their origin and how they arrived at the DIA.
