Scubatherapy

"The thrill for me is when a diver first looks down, and says, 'Oh my God, I'm standing up. I'm not in my wheelchair. "I tell people this really isn't about scuba diving," says Jim Elliott. "This is about taking an individual with a disability and creating a paradigm shift. So now it's not 'Johnny in a wheelchair.' It's 'Johnny the scuba diver.' And then they go on and they take on other challenges."

What Jim Elliott quickly learned is that "scuba therapy," benefits people with an array of physical, cognitive, and mental conditions. In addition to training divers with paralysis, they train people with cerebral palsy, multiple sclerosis, limited vision or blindness, ALS, autism, and post-traumatic stress disorder.

Training sessions take place in pools and deep quarry lakes in Illinois and Wisconsin, and there are affiliate Diveheart chapters elsewhere in the United States and the world. The nonprofit has built relationships with resorts and trained dive operators globally, and it leads group trips to places like the Caribbean islands of Cozumel, Grenada, and Roatán.
