Vocational Minute: Steven Bruce, Vice President Marketing and Sales for Atlas Disposal spoke about his vocation... Steve has been in the trash business for over 25 years and spoke about Atlas Disposal and Clean World Partners, both of Sacramento, recently broke ground on a $13 million anaerobic digester and renewable natural gas fueling station in south Sacramento. The Organic Waste Recycling Center at the South Area Transfer Station on Fruitridge Road will process 25 tons of food waste a day and 9,100 tons annually... Collected by Atlas Disposal from local food-processing companies, restaurants and supermarkets and convert it into natural gas, electricity and heat, as well as fertilizer and soil amendments CWP plans to expand the plant to process 100 tons of waste per day 36,500 tons annually making it the largest commercial-scale, high-solids anaerobic system in the United States.. This plant is a "triple benefit," as it will divert landfill waste, create renewable energy and eliminate greenhouse gases and is an example of how "green" business can make money and create jobs for the Sacramento region. The basic technology of anaerobic digesters is safe, reliable and being used in thousands of locations through the world, but commercial adoption hasn't been widespread in the United States, CWP officials said. In the conversion process, natural microorganisms break down biodegradable waste material to produce gas, including methane, carbon dioxide and small amounts of hydrogen and hydrogen sulfide. The gas can be used to generate electricity or as fuel for vehicles.

CWP's organic waste recycling plant at American River Packaging's headquarters was the first commercial high-solid anaerobic digestion system in the United States. It was the product of a public-private partnership including the packaging company, Campbell Soup Co., Atlas Disposal, Otto Construction, UC Davis and Sacramento Municipal Utility District. CWP is sole owner of the plant, which it paid for with private financing and a federal grant. A $1.31 million grant from the California Energy Commission helped with pre-development work. Atlas Disposal, which manages waste for the greater Sacramento area, already has 14 trucks, about 25 percent of its fleet, running on cleaner-burning compressed natural gas. At first, the renewable natural gas will power Atlas Disposal trucks, but eventually, the fuel could be used by local school districts, transit and distribution companies. Atlas Disposal envisions, in five years, fueling 100 to 150 trucks and up to 80 school buses. Natural-gas-powered heavy-duty vehicles reduce smog-causing emissions by more than 80 percent and reduce greenhouse gas emission by 10 to 15 percent over a comparable diesel vehicle & as much as 90 percent quieter. Roughly 90 percent of the electricity produced will be used to power the digester and refueling station, and the balance will be sold to SMUD through a net metering agreement. Thanks Steve...

Marsha also writes creative non-fiction about traveling, retirement, and golf. Her current project is a Literary Academy... This after-school program is designed to help elementary school children discover the joys of writing. With the help of a Kindergarten teacher at Mariposa Elementary School she is working with eleven students, first through fifth graders, with the goal of each student writing and illustrating their own book by the end of the school year. She hopes to inspire more volunteers to join her and be able to offer the Writing Academy in other Elementary Schools within the Citrus Community next year... Marsha told several stories of how this all began; hearing a child say to her that she could hardly read so how could she write a book.... Being asked by a child why she did not write about a Turtle... Marsha is focused on teaching how to write and illustrate and how you develop a plot... Each child will receive their own book (hard bound) that they authored... She will also place the writings on the Shutterfly website.
